Kenyan's opinions on decisions and priorities at election time

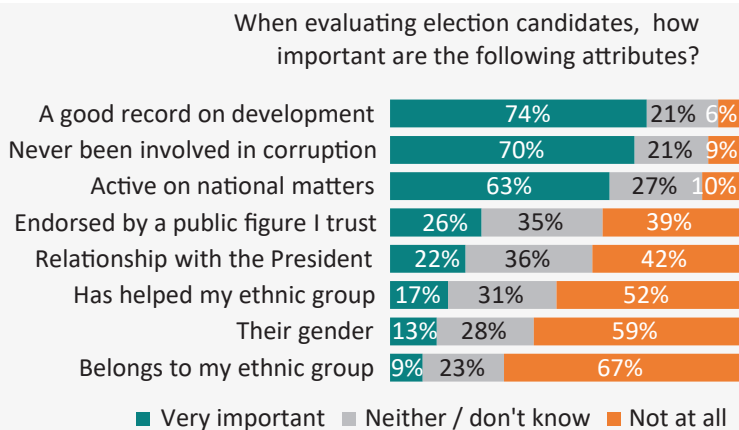

This brief explores questions around electoral choices among Kenyan citizens. What do citizens see as important when choosing who to vote for? And what issues do they think should be prioritised? The data presented here comes mainly from Twaweza's Sauti za Wananchi survey, a nationally-representative, high-frequency mobile phone panel survey of public opinion and citizens' experiences. Further details are available from www.twaweza.org/sauti.

Insight 1. Citizens say they value a candidates record on development and corruption over their gender or ethnicity

Most citizens say a candidate's record on matters of development (74%), corruption (70%) and national affairs (63%) are important factors when evaluating candidates.

In contrast, few citizens say a candidate's gender (13%) or ethnicity (9%) is important among artists in rural areas (17%).

Insight 2. Different demographic groups share the preference for a candidate's record over their identity

Across a range of demographic groups, the pattern of preferring candidates with a good record on development and corruption over other matters is broadly consistent. Very little difference can be seen in the preferences of men and women, younger and older citizens, those in urban and rural areas or in different regions of the country.

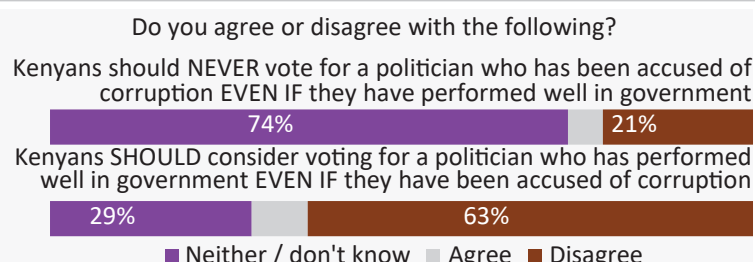

The only demographic breakdown showing any substantial difference is education level, with better-educated citizens showing even greater preference for a candidate's record on development and corruption. Those with less education still rank these as the most important factors, but not so much as those with higher levels of education.

Insight 3. Most citizens say we should never vote for candidates accused of corruption, even if they have a good record in other ways

Three out of four citizens (74%) say Kenyans should never vote for a politician who has been accused of corruption, even if they have performed well in other matters of government. Similarly, six out of ten (63%) disagree with the view that citizens should consider voting for politicians who have performed well even if they have been accused of corruption.

Insight 4. More citizens think their elected representatives cannot be trusted than say they can be trusted a lot

More citizens say their elected representatives cannot be trusted at all than say they can be trusted a lot. A significant number say the representatives can be trusted only to some extent.

This pattern is consistent across five different types of representatives: Member of County Assembly (MCA), Member of Parliament (MP), Woman Rep, Senator and Governor.

Insight 5. Citizens top priorities for improving citizens' lives are to fight corruption, improve the electoral system and create jobs

The main actions suggested by citizens to improve people's lives in Kenya are to fight corruption (22%), strengthen the electoral system (16%) and create employment (16%).

These are followed by improving the economy (12%), the education sector (7%) and infrastructure (7%).

Insight 6. Different demographic groups share the same priorities for improving citizens' lives

Across a range of demographic groups, the same suggestions for improving people's lives are broadly shared. Women and men, younger and older people, those in rural and urban areas and different parts of the country all say corruption, the electoral system and employment should be the top priorities.

The exception is education level: better-educated citizens are even more likely than others to prioritise corruption and the electoral system, while those with lower levels of education are less likely to do so.
